

Solutions for Companies Experiencing Disruptive Change

Challenges

In the current market, underperforming companies are at increased risk due to tightening credit and more restrictive financial and regulatory requirements. Most companies do not have the requisite skills in house to successfully navigate through the complex situations posed by the rapidly changing market conditions. For investors or lenders, the impact of an insolvent company on their portfolio can be devastating. The key is recognizing a crisis when it is still in its infancy and can be contained or addressed. But being able to identify a crisis and manage the situation can be time consuming and may require a unique skill set that will preserve and add value to companies who are failing to meet performance expectations.

- Is your company performing below expectations?
- Are your management structures effective?
- Has your company failed to move to the next stage of growth?
- Are you encountering early stage financial challenges?
- Does your company have business units that have stagnated?
- Has your company been recently acquired?

Solutions

It is a rare occurrence for a business crisis to occur overnight. Usually problems arise from a series of events or poor decisions that cascade into a crisis. However management is often blindsided because problems tend to build incrementally. Those who are intimately involved with the company become accustomed to the warning signs that would otherwise prompt attention and action.
